

Milner – Discourse Analysis
By Jacques Alain-Milner

I. I am Milner

I, a young man, deeply into philosophy, then read psychoanalysis, and found the world unresponsive to the style of analysis actually called psychoanalysis. Imagine that one can free the world by simply following French, the language, that the whole country cannot speak, because it is in psychoanalytic format a discourse, which is meant for philosophical discussions – in its normal state of practices a deeply reified and perhaps creative use of a philosophical discourse.

II. If I learnt Language – would it cure and lead to meta-physics? I mean a longer life, l'avenir dure long tiempe – Althusser's biography of eternity.

Imagine people learning French as psychoanalysis, they would understand that the French instance simply relieves one of stress felt in psychology, because it creates a resonant atomism in that simple Wittgensteinian sense.

Althusser meant, then psychology is free, and even divine over the body, he meant like sex leads to infinity in poetry, there is a psychological law leading to infinite life.

III. Discourse Analysis in English then.

Imagine the discourse of an able leader, like say, Mao Zedong, he is then conflicted with, antagonized, and wronged – Sirohi does argue for a major public crisis, but that was a demonstration as Mao presents to the world – now imagine the people condemning him. Fuck Mai, then, call it poetic this mess.
